

School Rights

1. How can I get my children back in school? Enroll them where you are staying. Your children have a legal right to go to school in Texas after a disaster. If they cannot go to their usual school, you have a right to enroll your children in the school district where you are living. Contact the school district and tell them you have children you want to enroll in school because of the disaster.
2. Why should I enroll my children in school? Going to school is good for most children who have survived a disaster. It helps them keep up with their schoolwork. School gives them a much-needed normal routine. School gives parents a break and allows them time to do the things they need to do to help the family recover from the disaster. Schools can help feed eligible children through their breakfast and lunch programs.
3. Can my children go to school if we live in a shelter? Yes. It does not matter where you live - your children have a right to go to school. You can be living in a shelter, tent, trailer, hotel, motel, campground, in your car, in a park, or with friends or relatives - your children have a legal right to go to school.
4. What papers do my children need to go back to school? Very little. Typically, you will not need proof that you live in the area, old school records, or shot records. Your children will be enrolled for 30 days (about 4 and a half weeks) without the usual paperwork. That time will probably be extended if you cannot get home or get the papers at the end of 30 days (about 4 and a half weeks).
5. Will my children ride the bus? If needed. Children who have survived a disaster and are enrolling in school all have the same legal rights as any other children going to school. If children living near where you are living are riding the bus, your children will probably get to ride the bus.
6. What about my child with disabilities? You have a legal right to enroll your child in school, and your child has the legal right to get special services needed. Federal law protects children with disabilities.
 - Even if you do not have paperwork about your child, like the "Individualized Education Plan" that the child's old school did, you still have the right to enroll your child, and your child has a right to special services.
 - You should tell the new school what your child's needs are. The school must work with you to provide the special services your child needs.
